The 2016-17 Standing Rock water protection camps at the heart of Turtle Island were the largest assembly of Indigenous Peoples in recent history. Gathered nations confronted big energy's extreme extraction through the strength of their ceremonies, histories, and connections. Despite being met with violence, many who brought their best intentions to this historic fight continue to expand their love and sovereignty – while they shift our world away from the trauma and isolation of modern days.

The film is based around prophecy of the Eagle and Condor that originates with nations from the South and features ceremony held at the Dakota Access Pipeline (DAPL) site on Indigenous People's Day, October 10, 2016. The ancient prophecy predicted the epic Standing Rock water protection actions – and continues to challenge all to identify and unite our gifts and power.

Director, Kahsto'sera'a Paulette Moore (Mohawk), is an independent filmmaker, artist and affiliated professor of Indigenous Media and Philosophy with Northland College in Ashland, Wisconsin.
